

The last lecture I thought was a fascinating and important video. It made me ask many questions that also helped just evaluate some life questions in a different way. This lecture really stood out to me because of his outlook on life even when he knew he was going to die and how he wanted to make the best of his life and help others accomplish their dreams while he still could. I found this mainly important because at the end of the lecture he said that the last lecture was for his kids and that it wasn't just about fulfilling your childhood dreams but creating a guideline for life and what they should strive for in their life. This creates the feeling that you shouldn't be afraid to chase your aspirations in life and that if you work hard your goals would also come to you and that you need to make the best of your opportunities.

Another thing that stood out to me was his definition of brick walls being put in your way to test your perseverance against who really wants something. I found this part particularly interesting because I have found that throughout my life that these obstacles become quite apparent when you are striving towards certain goals be it people or just situations in general. Another part that I found very insightful is living with the hand that you are dealt and making the most out of it and I found that very inspiring. I think that it is a skill to be able to remain positive in difficult times and that this guy was a perfect example of someone that has honed that skill. No matter that he is going to die he remains positive and wants to help the next generation in any way that he can with the time that he has left. I think that his positive attitude is something that most people feel compelled toward and that a lot of people can learn something from trying to adapt that positive attitude and seeing where it takes them in life.
